This biocultural course in nutritional anthropology examines the multiple meanings and functions of food from both the cultural and biological perspective. We look at food not only as biological nourishment, but also as integral to social behaviors, group cohesion, and personal identity. We also consider how these two modes of understanding food interact.