The H.J. Andrews National Forest in eastern Lane County is a place for scientific research and study of the natural environment. With its vast acres of forested land, one can find countless places for engagement with nature, as well as many secluded spots for solitude and meditation. The design for a reflection and worship shelter atop Lookout Mountain engages the person with views of the Three Sisters and the surrounding panorama. The overarching shell for the building is reminiscent of the undulating layers of nature that can be observed from above, as these layers serve not only as a physical distance between one and the mountains, but also as a spiritual and self-reflective creature between man and the beyond.
