These following questions will help me define what I wish to achieve through the personal project and therefore my goal.

• What do I want to achieve through my personal project?

I will like to make a project in which I could help my city or my community. I want to help it, and improve it; I want to improve something that hasn't been yet improved: helping at the same time I am innovating. I will like to make something that could have certain impact, for instance a positive impact in the environment and the people.

• What do I want other to understand though my work?

I wish to give others the capacity to open their minds and understand that beyond their bubbles, we are living in world that has serious problems and we are the only ones capable of repairing them. I am approaching local problems to show people of my community that they are no far away from the problematic and that, for example, "xxx" is a city going through global warming as well.

• What impact do I want my project to have?

With the project, I am hoping to make a call on those who haven't yet realized the situation of our surrounding. I want to inform people, I want to help others and also make my community help others. I wish to create a change in both the city and its population, or at least my school and the students.

• How can a specific context enrich my project?

Two contexts could help and enrich my project. Once my goal is defined I will choose just one of the contexts, the first one is "An inquiry into scientific and technical innovation" or "An inquiry into globalization and sustainability."

Which topic can cause the impact I wish to cause?

Global context reflection

Both contexts that were chosen today could help my project in the future regardless of the topic because I want to lead that way.
